Thomas Cousins is a social anthropologist with particular interests in health, labour, kinship, and science studies. He recently completed a PhD at Johns Hopkins University in 2012 and now teaches in the Department of Sociology and Social Anthropology at Stellenbosch University. His doctoral dissertation was an ethnography of life around the timber plantations of northern KwaZulu-Natal, focusing on the logic and effects of a nutrition intervention for plantation workers in the context of a crisis of social reproduction and bodily capacity. He continues to conduct fieldwork on the intersections of nutrition, the body, politics, and public health. He is currently part of a collective effort to re-imagine the practice of anthropology from Stellenbosch as a peculiar location for the study of populations, persons, and politics.
